

ABSTRACT

Self-meaning has an important influence on a person's psychological state. This self-meaning is a process of how a person is able to see inside himself and is able to accept all aspects of himself without any hatred that arises. Adolescents with broken home conditions are very difficult to do self-definition because in the process of self-interpretation and the formation of identity, the role and support of the family, especially both parents, are needed.

This study aims to describe the self-meaning of adolescents built by intrapersonal communication in pre-divorce family conflicts of both parents. This study uses a qualitative description method with the research subjects are adolescents who have communication problems, aged 19-22 years from broken home families in the city of Bandung. The data obtained from informants comes from in-depth observations and interviews.

The results of this study indicate that most informants stated that the divorce of both parents made a very meaningful life lesson for them. The interpersonal communication process that follows brings them to be more enthusiastic about managing their lives in the future, as well as making them more grateful for having learned meaningful life lessons in their youth.

Keywords: self-meaning, adolescence, intrapersonal communication, broken home