

ABSTRACT

This study aims to learn about interpersonal communication within the broken home family in the city of Tangerang and to see how the communication and attitude of the members of the broken home family. Because researchers have found that communication in broken homes has obstacles between children's parents and that it is not uncommon for them to be discriminated against. Because of this, the researchers tried to jump right into the homes of the broken home in which the researchers were born, and it was one of the areas within Indonesia's highest divorce cases. The techniques used in this study are interviews and direct observations, in which researchers made direct observations in the broken home of a certain length of time to establish a high level of validity. Researchers hope that this study will open up the insights of broken home parents to get closer and more time for their children. Because they need a person for parents as an example and as a person who can guide them into being human and not outside of social norms. In addition, researchers hope that the research will be one of the clues to the broken home family.

Key Words: Communication, Interpersonal Communicarion, Broken Home