People's lifestyles are increasingly experiencing developments, creating a new paradigm for managers who view that hospitals are not just buildings with health services, but can provide both medical and non-medical services. It should be realized that the condition of pregnant women can undergo drastic changes that include psychological and social changes. The new hospital environment with new people can trigger anxiety and fear for parents and even children which will greatly affect their physical and psychological conditions so there needs to be a hospital that is able to respond to this condition. In this design, in addition to the distribution of type B health care facilities, the design of a maternal and child hospital which is assumed to be on Jalan Pasir Koja, Bandung aims to create a hospital design with effective and efficient space management and able to provide stimulation in the healing process. patients through the design of hospital interior elements.

In its design, the atmosphere of the space that will be created refers to the psychological conditions and characteristics of users who are mother and child oriented with the theme Tranquility for wellbeing which presents a comfortable and relaxed atmosphere in the interior of the house with the method of completion Healing Environment which means focusing treatment design on psychological conditions by combining natural elements to create a comfortable, relaxed atmosphere and can relieve anxiety in patients. Design by creating a comfortable environment can help the patient's healing process by eliminating anxiety through space organization arrangements, circulation, treatment of interior elements and also the availability of public facilities that can answer the issue of the spread of the virus.
