

ABSTRACT

Dating is a form of social relationship between individuals based on a special attraction and built on commitment. However, in adolescent dating relationships, toxic relationships are not uncommon; these are harmful relationships that benefit one party while disadvantaging the other. This study aims to examine how the dimensions of inclusion, control, and affection in FIRO theory influence the social behavior of students who are victims of toxic relationships. This research uses a qualitative method. The results of this study found: 1) Inclusion begins when one partner isolates the other's life, leading to verbal and physical abuse, 2) Control in this study involves restricting activities through emotional manipulation to influence the victim, and 3) Affection in a toxic relationship occurs because one partner feels empowered over the other's life, leading to excessive control and dominance. There is a need for programs or campaigns to raise awareness about toxic relationships and their impact on individual behavior, which can help in recognizing and avoiding the pitfalls of a toxic relationship
