

Abstract

The family is the smallest group in society, the family itself usually consists of several family members such as father, mother and children. Generally, the relationship between family members is very close to each other, but this also depends on how communication exists between the family members. Effectiveness in family communication can determine or describe how tight and close the relationship between family members is.

Then, if family communication within a family does not go well, then this can lead to miscommunication between family members which can ultimately result in conflicts, both small and large. If the conflict tends to be large then this can lead to household breakdown or divorce. Divorce is an act of separation between a husband and wife who are already legally married.

There are many factors that can cause divorce apart from miscommunication, namely economic factors, violence that occurs in the household, the influence of the presence of a third party or cheating and many more. Therefore, the aim of this research is to be able to thoroughly examine and find out how family communication patterns occur in divorced families, especially in Cibinong District, so that readers can find out family communication patterns that can cause divorce, so that it can be avoided.
